The mails from Cape Colony bring information respecting an unusually fortunate week in the diamond diggings. The stone discovered by Mr. Parkes, referred to in the following article from the Cape Argus, is valued at from $40,000 to $45,000. He had offered the night before to sell his claim for fitteen shillings. sell his claim for fifteen shillings. The other large diamond is estimated as of nearly equal value with that of Mr. Parkes:
There are two ways by which Cape people judge of the success of the now-established diamond industry. The first and most important is the actual yield of diaof diamonds found has been greater than in any previous fortnight since the dig-gings commenced, while several diamonds exceptionally large have been turned up. When the last mail summary was for-warded to England, a rumor had reached paving been discovered. Two diamonds. weighing respectively 56 and 54 carats, have, without doubt, been found. One, we believe, is a very fine gem, of good shape; the other, somewhat flawed. The discoverers were as startled as any one else discoverers were as startled as any one else at their own good luck. In both cases the "claims" had promised so little that the majority of those working them had left in despair, and had gone elsewhere to try their fortunes.
